Anat Ebgi, a gallerist with three spaces in Los Angeles, is opening in New York. The move to a historic block in Tribeca will be “amazing for many of our artists, who have not had a show in New York”, Ebgi says. Her gallery will have two floors and a mezzanine level across about 5,000 sq ft — bigger than any of her spaces in LA. “Unlike most people, I went to New York and found more square footage,” she says. Her neighbours in the increasingly popular gallery area will include PPOW and Andrew Kreps, while the midtown Marian Goodman Gallery moves its New York base nearby, to 385 Broadway, next year.

Ebgi plans a soft opening on November 2, to coincide with the Art Dealers Association of America’s annual fair. This show will include work by the Polish artist Krzysztof Strzelecki, who is recreating a gym in ceramics, says Stefano di Paola, the gallery partner who is overseeing the New York opening. Anat Ebgi will then formally open with a group show in January followed by a solo show of the LA artist Greg Ito.
